Capital Punishment - Justice or Murder?
Chris Ransler

"One should never have less, after 20 years of life in prison, to go on and murder again"

Capital Punishment is argued about throughout the world. It is debated as to whether it is humane or if it prevents innocent lives. Capital Punishment is the lawful sentence of death pronounced by the courts for a variety of serious crimes. Some countries do not have the punishment, such as Britain. However, eight other countries use Capital Punishment as a sentence. It is debated as to whether or not this is just harsh.

Through examination of the questionnaires which I carried out, I discovered that seven out of the twenty people I asked favoured Capital Punishment. Out of the thirteen people who disagreed or did not have an opinion they agreed with Capital Punishment, all agreed it was either humane or not humane people should be able to decide on. Out of twenty people who disagreed, 10 felt for a life in jail. Everyone agreed that any justice system in Britain to wrong and should be changed. Seven people said that the most humane form of Capital punishment is the gas chamber. A majority also felt that bringing the death penalty back into force in Britain would help to prevent serious crimes. These people all shared the same opinion, that criminals in death row should be given the choice of their method of death.

My questionnaires also demonstrated that the majority of young people, and many of the people that lived in the area where Capital Punishment was available, would not mind Capital Punishment being introduced in our country. I think from the results of the questionnaires that people are wanting the return of the death penalty don't because they feel it is humane and that there should be a better way to deal with criminals, rather than returning to execution.

Over time there have been about four hundred thousand more to be had, recorded sentences of Capital Punishment, the first ever recorded in 1790. Over time the method of execution has changed. Since records of Capital Punishment began the hanging type is the most used hanging. Hanging was when the criminal would stand on a chair or a tripod, their necks would be around their neck. The tree would be pulled away or the rope would be pulled around the neck. The rope would get his neck and the neck would tighten around the criminal's neck. If his neck was not broken he would be strangled to death.

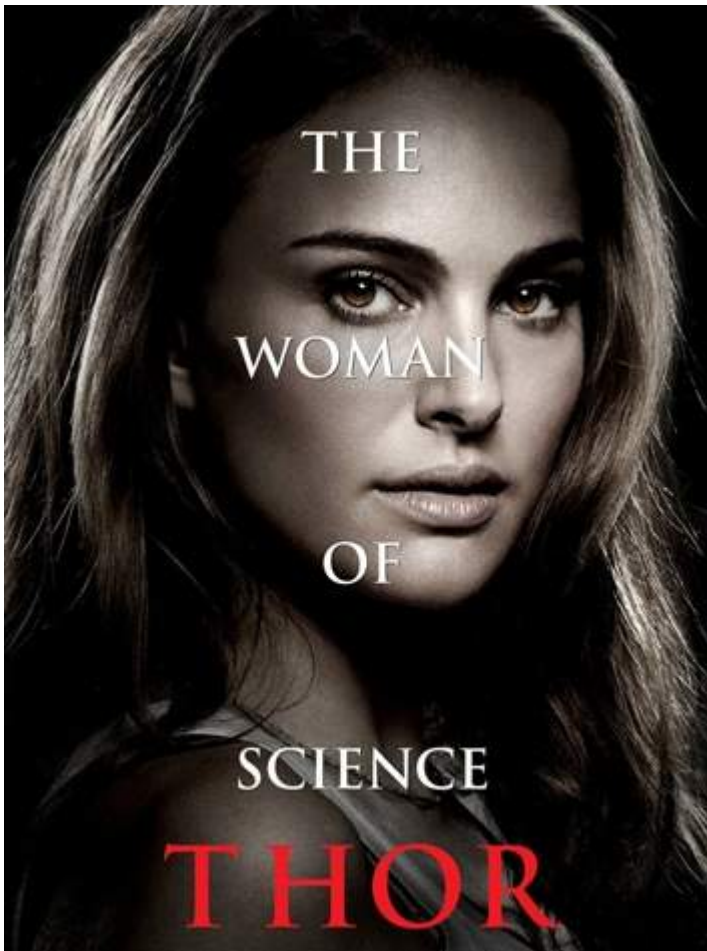

A popular punishment for treason in Great Britain was to be "hung, drawn and quartered". The convict was hung and when they were nearly dead they were cut down. While they were still alive their necks were cut out and later burnt. They were cut up into four pieces and displayed in the same four corners to towns.

In Norman times, Christians would be people in the ground to be buried alive by criminals. In the sixteenth century a cruel execution known as "breaking on the wheel" was used. The accused's limbs were cut off to the ground, multiple blades of which were placed under the body where their bones were and a wheel with an iron bar would be fit to operate to break the bones in their body without killing them, but leaving them in excruciating pain. Their limbs
