The Formation of Relationships

Notes:

- 1. A relationship is an association with another person or with other people that endures through time.
- 2. This essay links at least that relationship is formed - how it started.
- 3. Three different theories: reward/reward satisfaction theory, the filter model and the similarity model.

Paragraph 1 - Reward/Need Satisfaction Theory:

- Theory is developed by Clark et al (1976)
- Proposes that we seek positive stimuli and avoid punishing stimuli for example positive stimuli such as need for company, financial security and attractive partner
- Rewarding stimuli produce positive feelings - make us happy, negative stimuli produce negative feelings - make us unhappy
- Operant conditioning - likely to repeat any behavior that leads to a desirable outcome - the person who creates that feeling in us, we are likely to see them attractive.
- Classical conditioning - associate happy feelings with people. For example if you're in a happy mood and you meet someone, you associate that happy mood with the person and vice versa.
- May and Hamilton (1980) - asked female students to say how they liked the look of male strangers whose photographs they were given. 3 groups, one saw pictures of men with pleasant music, second saw with unpleasant music and third with no music. Group that saw pictures with pleasant music rated the men the highest.

Evaluations:

- Gender bias - only looked at females
- Individuals might have previously found males more attractive.
- Demand characteristics

Paragraph 2 - Filter model:

- Theory proposed by Burt et al
- Says that relationships develop through different filters - different factors are important at different times
- People are narrowed down through the filter to those who you consider potential partners
- First filter is social variables such as proximity, ethnicity, religion and social class.
- Second filter is attitudes and values such as ideas, beliefs interest and communication.
- Third filter is emotional needs, which includes how they fit together, are emotional supportive etc.
- Research conducted on students by Gruber et al found that students who filtered through the first filter lasted longer in a relationship.

Evaluations:

- Population validity - difficult to generalize - only students
- Internal validity

RELATIONSHIPS
Breakdown of Relationships

Reasons for Relationship Breakdown:

Lack of Skills:

- For some people, relationships are difficult because they lack interpersonal skills which make them socially unskilled.
- Individuals who lack social skills will find it difficult to communicate and therefore could be poor conversationalists. Due to this, it is difficult for them to indicate their interest to other people, making them generally unattractive for the other person.
- Hence, others will assume that they are not interested, thus allowing a relationship to breakdown before it can develop.

Lack of Stimulation:

- According to V.E. people seek rewards in a relationship, stimulation probably being one of them. Therefore, it is possible that lack of stimulation i.e. boredom/thinking the relationship is not going anywhere, could lead to the relationship breaking down.
- There is evidence that this is often quoted when ending a relationship. So, because people expect relationships to change and develop, when they do not see this happening, it is seen as a sufficient reason for them to end the current relationship or begin a new one i.e. affairs.

Undergraduates were asked to cite sexual and emotional reasons for being unfaithful in a committed relationship. Participants judged that sexual reasons for infidelity are more likely to be used by men (sexual excitement/boredom etc.) and emotional reasons are more likely to be used by women (lack of excitement/interaction etc.)

Maintenance Difficulties:

- Some relationships can become strained because partners are unable to see each other often e.g. going away to university. This can potentially lead to the breakdown of a relationship.
- Although it is possible that romantic relationships can be strong enough to endure the problems and difficulties of not seeing each other, for many relationships, this is not the case.

A study found that 70% of students reported that experienced or more sex (100%) during Distance Romantic Relationships, and that 85% had experienced one (50%) during Distance Friendships.

- It is useful to understand the strategies that people use, as people have to move away from their family/friends from suitable activities.

A study found that there was little decrease in relationship satisfaction, as long as women were able to maintain often.

A Model of Breakdown:

Phrasing of Personal:

- Disillusion - One of the partners becomes disillusioned and dissatisfied with the relationship. The realization of unrealistic relationships may be the first step in the eventual breakdown of the relationship.
- Intermittent Phase - Intermittent: A negative focus on the relationship. Partner becomes socially withdrawn and nothing is said to their partner, but can be expressed in other ways e.g. personal diary.
 - Some people even end their relationship without discussing their dissatisfaction.
- Double Phase - People confront their partners about the dissatisfaction and discuss their feelings/feelings. This could resolve the issue and save the relationship or partners may resolve others in their dissatisfaction with the relationship.
